Just thinking out loud here...but as an outside observer who really doesn't have a personal connection to the case (other than being an Oakland County kid) and doesn't have a suspect of my own, it seems to me that we have three (Cass Corridor, Fox Island, and the OCCK) very distinct cases going on here....4 if you count the unsolved murder of McKinney, and 5 if you include Busch's "suicide". Perhaps LE may want to investigate each case on its own merit and see where the leads take them. One more thought, it may be way overdue to investigate the 4 victims on their own too - if a group was actually involved, than you may not get the same players with each of the kids.

One thing that is deep in my memory was that John seem to have emphasis so much on how he was friends with these children before he killed them. This seem like a thrill to him almost like he was proud of it that he became friends with them,

I actually emailed Helen and asked her if it was possible John "rescued" the kids from Busch's crew. Of course, she laughed at me..) But, I do remember the talk about how John was saving the kids, not harming them, or something along those lines.

I don't know - after too many years of trying to find answers the mind starts running in circles.

No, I am not a doctor and I am really not from Ypsilanti. It always lists that by my name. I wonder what the reason for that is. I am familiar and sometimes work with young people with autism and through this I have met autistic people of all degrees and all ages. I have also done extensive research on it, but I am not a professional or expert. Him having a history of mental instability in his family is a huge indicator. This I know for a fact, but still some professionals will deny a genetic predisposition. If he was allowed to make friends with the victims (My impression is that he did not do anything like this alone if he is involved) it would be seen as a near actualization experience. It would be a pinnacle for him socially and a realization of something he probably already gave up on. It would make sense, because he could behind in social development, like we discussed, but still have a wealth of interesting info and talents to fascinate a kid. He would want the friendship to wok, in my view, and would probably advocate for things to appease his new friend in order to allow for a longer friendship experience. Again I want to qualify that this is purely speculation based on hearsay, but I'm going with my gut for a minute to play at
